Dynamic Interpersonal Therapy (DIT) is a time limited and structured psychotherapy, typically delivered over 16 weekly sessions. It aims to help the client understand the connection between presenting symptoms and what is happening in his/her relationships through identifying a core repetitive pattern of relating that can be traced back to childhood. Once this pattern is identified, it is used to make sense of difficulties in relationships in the here-and-now that contribute to psychological stress.

Therapy comes in many forms, each model or approach having a particular focus and emphasis. DIT focuses mostly on relationship problems. When a person is able to deal with a relationship problem more effectively, his or her psychological symptoms often improve and life becomes more meaningful and constructive. DIT aims to help people recognise specific relationship patterns and to make changes. There is a growing body of scientific evidence demonstrating the benefit of this approach.

In DIT, the therapist encourages the client to reflect on thoughts and feelings, thereby enhancing the ability to manage current interpersonal difficulties. DIT aims at relieving distress, enhancing interpersonal functioning and the capacity for understanding oneself and others. Throughout therapy, the therapist helps the client to find more appropriate ways of being and coping with difficult relationships in life, and also difficult relationships between parts of the internal world and conflicts within the self.
